The Uniqueness of a Christian Worldview in Counseling

Terry & Sandra Lodico

What is unique about a Christian worldview in counseling? The uniqueness is in the understanding of the personality. There are over two hundred personality models in psychology today. The majority of these theories approach counseling from an observed human behavioral perspective. This helpful approach benefits by profiling emotional and mental health symptoms for diagnosing and giving direction for treatment. Moreover, behavioral studies determine the best therapeutic approaches that prove to be effective for resolving unique psychological or behavioral issues. Scientific technology continues to unlock an understanding of the brain and nervous system that give further insight to our pathologies.

A Christian perspective, in addition, looks at a second source of knowledge for insight, the Scripture. God's Word teaches that we have been wonderfully created. Man is made up of not only a material body, but also an immaterial personal-self called the soul or spirit, in the image of God (Ge. 1:26, 2:7)<sup>1</sup>. A Christian worldview, therefore, looks to scripture for the presuppositions to guide our thoughts in how to view the nature of personality and psychological problems.<sup>2</sup> This personality model explains how we approach therapy at Covenant Counseling.

<sup>1</sup> Scripture gives us a great deal of insight with what is meant by the statement we are "created in the image of God." One insight is that we desire intimacy as God desires intimacy. We are like God in that we have jurisdictions of responsibility or dominions of authority. This is important to understand in regards to marriage and the raising of children. In addition, moral laws reflect God's nature and created design, therefore, the means for man's successful living. These laws are blessing to believers and non-believers alike when they govern a person's conscious. An example would be the effect of depression. Some people commit crimes when depressed and others will not commit crimes, based upon the degree of moral fortitude. A developed moral conscious often guides one from destructive behaviors when emotionally vulnerable. On the other hand, God's goal that we experience "abundant life" (John. 10:10b), requires salvation and sanctification, being set free from the penalty of sin (i.e., death), and free from the power of the sinful nature that drives us to sin and to habits of unhealthy behavior.

<sup>2</sup> Knowledge that we gain by observation of God's creation is called, theologically, general revelation. Behavioral psychology restricts its approach to this revelation. Scripture is classified as special revelation as it reveals what general revelation does not; the wisdom and purpose of God, the nature of man and the means to an intimate relationship with God.
